Health Benefits of Tribal Casinos Going Smoke-free

When the coronavirus pandemic concludes, people's perspective of health will likely be entirely different. The world that everyone once knew is evolving and now serves as an opportunity for prevention. With many Tribal casinos currently closed due to COVID-19, it's essential that casinos think about the health of their patrons and employees. For decades, secondhand smoke exposure in casinos have impacted tribal members, guest patrons, and casino employees. Many tribal employees agree that working in a smoke-free environment boost work productivity and allows them to breathe better. This is an opportunity for tribal casinos to shift with the current changing world and transition to 100% smoke-free.

Watch this video to learn more about the health benefits of reopening casinos 100% smoke-free. The time begins now for a heathy future for patrons, employees, and business owners. To watch video, CLICK HERE.

Podcast Opportunity:

Inequality, Mass Incarceration, and Social Justice for Native Americans

The current pandemic that has swept through many parts of the country has spotlighted many issues and health disparities within tribal communities. With little recognition of tribal concerns during COVID-19, tribes struggled to feed their communities, provide technical support for home school learning, and serve direct health care for rural tribal members. Join Pulitzer Prize winning journalist, Nicholas Kristof, and Johns Hopkins Center for American Health Director, Allison Barlow, voice current problems in tribal communities with host, Billy Shore. This podcast will share insights about poverty, education, and social justice in Native American communities. To listen to podcast, CLICK HERE.
